Q: Optimizing TableView scrolling when sorting I have an application I'm working on that has a TableView. Each TableViewCell is basically a Core Data entity, so in the TableView it is displayed in a batch of 5 (with different sections). When you scroll to the bottom, a set of buttons are displayed (top, bottom, etc) to sort these 5 batches. The way it is designed, there is only a single column for sorting. When you sort the rows, a separate NSFetchedRequest is performed so that a new batch is returned. However, this all takes a while, and on the iPhone, scrolling takes a fair bit of time. I tried to reduce the number of fetch request, to increase the number of batch rows per section (which is why the app is slow at the beginning, then it becomes really fast with the default settings), but I can't really see where I'm going wrong. How can I optimize the scrolling? The most important parts are the sorting and the batching.

A: When an NSFetchedResultsController is created, create a lot of "fake" fetch requests, one for each possible group. This can be done easily by changing the number of controllers managed by the controller. Say your data model contains 3 different entities, Car, Person, and PersonHistory. And you want to get all the Cars that belong to a particular person. The fetch request looks
