Whatsapp is a mobile messaging app developed by Facebook and a member of Facebook's former acquisitions Instagram, WhatsApp is a multiplatforms instant messaging client. WhatsApp has a feature that enables you to view WhatsApp messages as they were received on your device as well as share messages that you did not delete, even if they were encrypted. The app was launched in September of 2009 and is currently used by more than 500 million people. The app is available for the iPhone, iPad, Android, BlackBerry, Symbian, Windows Phone and the Bada operating system. The WhatsApp application allows you to share photos, audios, videos, documents, files, locations, and text messages through instant messaging. It also supports the file sharing capability through WhatsApp Web and WhatsApp Web Pro. WhatsApp also supports group messaging. Groups are a collection of people who can communicate with one another by using a thread of chat messages. The messages in the thread are chronologically displayed on the top of the chat screen and are not sorted by other members, they can see the messages in the thread as they were received. The WhatsApp application runs on several operating systems, including Windows Mobile, OS X, iOS, Android and Symbian. The operating system it supports is iOS for iPhone, iPod Touch, iPad and Android for all smartphones. You can download Whatsapp for free from the App Store for iPhone and iPod Touch. However, on Android smartphones you can download it from the Google Play store.

Whatsapp: Features A WhatsApp group is a collection of people who can communicate with one another through messages. There are two types of groups: Public groups, or public groups and Private groups, or private groups. Public groups can be created by anyone. While private groups can only be created by the user who creates the group, a public group can be created by anyone. WhatsApp groups can be created with up to 200 members. The maximum number of members for a group is 99 members. There is no minimum number of members. The members of the group are shown in the group list. When a new member is added to the group, all the other members are sent a notification about the new member in the group and they will be able to accept or reject the new member in the group

Relationship to anatomic features in donor corneas. To determine the clinical reliability of central corneal endothelial cell counts by specular microscopy and to establish a normal value for normal donor corneas. Cell counts were obtained from a central specular photograph of the cornea in a patient with a known anatomic diagnosis of angle-closure glaucoma. Two corneal endothelial photographs were obtained from normal donor corneas. A paired t test was used to compare the cell counts. Cell counts of 1585 and 2521 cells per square millimeter of donor corneas were obtained. Cell counts of corneas from patients with known anatomic diagnoses of angle-closure glaucoma were 3060 cells per square millimeter of cornea. The mean cell density of normal donor corneas is 2296 cells per square millimeter of cornea. Cell counts by specular microscopy can be used to provide an indication of donor corneal cell density in living donors.
