It is most useful for comparing two applicants with different backgrounds and as a prescreen of professional applicants such as engineers, lawyers, and physicians. The test is not intended to discriminate; it is offered as a convenience to job applicants. Given its short test time, the MD5 is an extremely quick and easy test which can be used, even by a non-specialist. The only other test of its kind available commercially, the MT5 test of mental ability is well-known in the British educational system but is generally not used in the United States because of its high cost. A good all-purpose test is valuable for monitoring the performance of employees while they complete a job. The test is considered fairly reliable in screening job applicants on the basis of their mental abilities and in predicting potential job performance. Its greatest strength is its brevity. The MD5 is most likely to be used when the job being screened involves clerical work, retail sales, or working with numbers. The MD5 is generally used to screen job applicants at professional and managerial levels. The MD5 is a very short test. It typically measures the applicant's ability to think abstractly and solve problems without many distractions. The purpose of this study was to assess the reliability and validity of the MD5 test.
