After managing to eat a very nice, delicious breakfast at the World's Worst Omelet Cafe I pulled into the meeting spot at 6:30. I was lucky enough to make it in time for the keynote. Then it was off to my meeting, and then on to the cocktail reception, where I met some interesting people. But the most fascinating part of my day was the keynote. The moderator was kind enough to start the panel in such a way that the participants wouldn't have to wait for me. I arrived just as the first presentation was starting. I made a beeline for the podium. Zach's keynote was really interesting. In addition to talking about the project, he also talked about lessons learned. Although we are in a slightly different position than typical Joomla! developers, most of these lessons can be applied to any Joomla! extension. Here is the audience, and Zach, pictured above. At one point the conference organizers had me stand up on the stage. The audience was really enthusiastic about the project. They came to support it, and to hopefully get
