The present invention relates generally to the field of content-based routing of data in communication networks, and more specifically to network services, such as voice over internet protocol ("VoIP") and video over internet protocol ("VoIP"), which are configured to deliver or route certain data based on its content. Voice over internet protocol ("VoIP") is a telecommunication service in which the user obtains voice communications through the Internet Protocol ("IP"). VoIP service enables a calling party to transmit data packets embodying voice information to a called party through the communications lines (e.g., modem, cable, digital subscriber line, etc.) of the public switched telephone network ("PSTN") instead of through the circuit-switched infrastructure of the PSTN. In such a configuration, the telecommunication service provider rather than the called party can control what services are provided to the calling party. Different techniques are used in IP telephony to deliver phone calls to an appropriate endpoint (also referred to as a subscriber location). For example, in connectionist IP telephony, an internet protocol telephony system may use one or more media gateways and one or more edge servers. The media gateways are used to mediate between the IP network and a public switched telephone network. The edge server is used as a proxy
