[Artificial light sources and circadian rhythms--phases, chronotypes, and health]. It has been clearly established that exposure to light is the most relevant factor influencing phase of circadian rhythms, chronotypes, sleep

time and sleep quality. Epidemiologic studies indicate that health benefits may be associated with exposure to light. The timing of daily exposure to light, however, is related with various adverse effects, e.g., emergence of morning-type insomnia, among others. Epidemiological studies, meta-analyses, and experimental data suggest that artificial light alters the circadian system by desynchronizing it and reduces sleep quality and quantity, as well as daytime alertness and performance. Exposure to bright light advances the phase of circadian rhythms, whereas dim light delays it. Exposure to bright light outside working hours accelerates circadian rhythms phase and increases alertness. Artificial light is particularly harmful for children because their circadian system is more plastic, so it is able to adjust easily. The most important effect of artificial light is the negative influence on sleep. There are data that exposure to bright light in the evening increases the risk of breast and endometrial cancer. Artificial light and television watching at night are associated with reduced sleep duration and quality, and increased risk of sleep disorders, depression and obesity. There are also data which demonstrate that exposure to bright light in the morning increases the risk of depression, breast cancer, and type 2 diabetes.
