The proposed research will serve to provide a greater understanding of the question: How do the nervous system processes contingent auditory stimuli? This question will be addressed primarily in terms of changes in the activity patterns of units in the auditory thalamus of the cat. The stimulus will be brief noise bursts and the receptive field of these units will be mapped as a function of the location of the stimulus. Both single unit responses and responses of a set of neurons in the auditory thalamus will be examined. Changes in the receptive fields, evoked potentials, the firing patterns of the thalamic units and the analysis of movement patterns will be used to identify the mechanoreceptors activated by noise bursts. To determine how these signal transduction systems interact and determine the significance of the information they carry, this study will examine a series of experiments designed to determine if changes in thalamic activity are correlated with changes in the behavior of the animal. The first experiment will allow us to determine the role of the different thalamic nuclei in controlling movement. The second experiment will examine the contribution of the basal ganglia to responses to sensory stimuli. The final

Franz Hurbach Franz Hurbach (January 9, 1874 – April 1, 1967) was an Austrian plant taxonomist who spent his life on the study of the flora of the Andes Mountains and neighbouring countries. In the course of his research he discovered over a thousand new species and published more than 200 papers. He is considered the founder of the taxonomic concept of the "American type flora" (Latin: florae Americae typus). Hurbach was born in Vienna, Austria in 1874. He studied zoology, botany, and ichthyology at the University of Vienna. He then transferred to the University of Leipzig, where he received his doctorate in 1901. He continued his research at the University of Göttingen. He was appointed at the University of Vienna as professor of natural history in 1912. Hurbach's work included the classification of the flora of the Indian Ocean, the Himalayas, and several of its regions and islands, as well as additional flora that were located on the Amazons and Colombian and Venezuelan coastlines. He discovered over a thousand new plant species, of which nearly 300 were established. By creating an in-depth system of classification based on details of the structure of the plants, and of their organs and features, Hurbach described and classified plants species within the genera. For his research, he won the Imperial Austrian Prize in 1912, with his discovery of the genus Podocarpus. In the course of his research, he also identified the

Pyrenean violet (Viola tricolorana) and Andean mint (Monarda fistulosa). Both plants were awarded the title of "Inventor" by the Chilean Ministry of the Environment. Hurbach's research dealt with the evolution of plants, and his classification system was an attempt to bring order to plant species. The International Commission of Plant Nomenclature uses his system in their botanical publications.

---

Hurbach lived in the Austrian capital city of Vienna. He died in his home on April 1, 1967, two days after his 90th birthday.
