In agile, teams tend to work in iterations. Typically teams gather at the start of an iteration and they inspect where they are at at the start of the iteration. That is, they make sure they're on the right path, and they reflect on what they've done so far. They talk about what they've already done, what they're about to do, and what they're worried about. How do you do the same thing as the first sentence when you're in a scrum project? Or a pilot project for that matter? How do you make the whole team look at the current state of their project? A: I'm not familiar with scrum, but in agile development processes, you have a similar idea called walking through the system. Generally, the team walks through the system as a whole at the start of every iteration, to update everyone on the status of the project and to identify any problems that might have arisen. A: The concept of Kanban was designed with this problem in mind, the idea of a backlog is that you are only keeping track of the changes in the project - not the current state of the project. So as your team move up the project you are incrementing a state value on your board - this is called a "Backlog". When you complete a sprint you put a state value on your backlog. This is how you manage scope, you don't go out
