We developed and applied a novel technique to look for stable endocrine functions in cell-based assays that is an improvement over existing methods. We refer to this as the stable genome-edited cell assay. This method relies on genome editing to create a 'neutral' phenotype that depends on physiologic processes and does not depend on the re-seeding of cells or their proliferation for an assay outcome. To create such a phenotype, cell lines are first exposed to the genome editing reagent, creating a subpopulation with constitutive reporter activation. The edited cell line is then mixed with 'wild-type' cells of the same line and both types are cultured together for a prolonged period of time. The proportion of edited cells indicates the stability of the reporter and, thus, its function. This method eliminates sources of variability that accumulate during cell culture from, for example, changing cell culture conditions, re-seeding, cell handling, etc. The method is particularly useful for assaying hormone-receptor interactions because this is a very long process. We used this method to assay for the full spectrum of steroid hormone receptors and have found that the assay is robust and can be applied to a wide variety of stable hormone effects. The assay can also be used to screen for novel hormone receptors, which we are currently pursuing. Osterix is a hematopoietic-specific transcription factor with osteoblastic functions

L'amore, l'amore / Italo (Director: Walter Matreyek)
L'amore l'amore l'amore is an experimental film which reflects on the influence of love in the history of art and the relationship between film and theater. It consists of animated and live character clips interspersed with scenes where the characters are seen by the actors/dancers playing them (and sometimes vice-versa), often singing or speaking. Through this film Walter Matreyek uses a combination of live and animated elements to explore relationships between the cinema, theatre and the narration/image. (Director: Calum Walter) A short documentary that is the first in a trilogy of films directed and produced by Calum Walter, exploring the idea of home from a unique perspective. The film explores the idea that in exploring home we are forced to view it as a series of glimpses and that there is no one definitive home that can always be reached. We explore the concept of the home space through the lives of its inhabitants and how they navigate the world, and ultimately, how the world navigates them. We also explore the idea that everything we encounter is a site of possible encounters and that every object we encounter is constantly monitoring our movements and sometimes our moves. The Climb / U.S.A. (Director: Calum Walter) The Climb is a documentary short film which explores the question of what it means to be American through the lens of a young climber. Current location:
