the epson p5000/ epson sc-p5000 are very easy printers to work with. as can be seen in the difference in the retouched calibration targets, the epson sc-p5000 prints excellent tone and hue profiles while maintaining very consistent 10% logspace measurements. the epson p5000 is a more expensive printer, and prints are more accurate; however, the printers cannot seem to maintain the levels of consistency that the epson sc-p5000 can. it's important to note here that the measurements included in these three profiles (epson sc-p5000 profile, epson p5000 profile, and standard i1profiler profile) are for comparison purposes only and were all taken on a single day. the profile that takes the actual measurement for the paper used in this test, will likely be different because of the environment, measuring conditions, and ambient light. according to my preset files for the p5000 (in the above example), the i1profiler profile is a match for the printing profile of the i1profiler - no surprise here. but look at the same table for the epson sc-p5000 profile: the i1profiler is much, much less accurate than the epson sc-p5000! the biggest differences are for the yellow tones. of course, there are all the yellow and orange tones, but the epson sc-p5000 profile has more correct colors in those regions. the lower end yellows and oranges are obviously very different. the epson sc-p5000 profile is the most accurate, but it's fairly expensive paper. for this reason, you could get the cheapest paper that still prints as accurately as the epson sc-p5000 for this test. this is the epson premium xtra glossy paper:
