The initial reaction to the initial preview of Lightroom 5 was cautious. The biggest change in the software was a significant tile space increase—a move which seems like it should have been implemented sooner—and overall it was disappointing. Then it came out how annoying the removal of Shadows and Highlights preview panels were. And then came the reintroduction of the Rectangular Selection, a once necessary feature lost between Lightroom 4.x and 5.1. Adobe Lightroom 4.7 caused so much confusion, leading to the eventual retirement of the popular panorama feature. Lightroom 5.2 promises a lot of fixes to these various issues, though. The system requires that all downloaded software be digitally signed with a certificate issued by Apple. Of course, this is to protect Apple's Mac App Store apps from piracy. macOS and iOS customers (via the Mac App Store) are always up-to-date, so they don't have to worry about installing an application that is not signed. Perhaps there is a possibility to use it for our great great great grandchildren, but one that we might not be around to use. It certainly would provide a fascinating experience to have your brain be enhanced from within. And if it is possible, that would be pretty serious.
