Converting your RAW image to DNG produced from your initial conversion is a new feature with Lightroom 3.5. If you want to create a DNG from a camera's native format (typically jpg), you can also do that now. That said, along with the new beta release of Lightroom 3.6 there are some interesting new features. One is the ability to create a version-controlled USB flashdrive image. You can keep your images safe and available. A copy of your original file and a copy of your current version are kept in sync. And with Lightroom Access, your Lightroom database is kept online and accessible to you. And more generally, Lightroom now includes a new file browser in the Mac Preview window, allowing you to browse and preview your catalog. You can add searchable, version-controlled keyword tags to all photos in your catalog, for example. For some creative photographers, Lightroom 3.5 represents a true step forward in their ability to organize their photo library. There are a lot of new features in Lightroom 3.6 that should make it a very useful tool for many users. While we don't have a full review of Lightroom 4 for Mac, we do have details on some of the new features. Lightroom 4 also adds a new layout for the Develop module, and new panels and windows in other sections. There is more conversion to DNG and a better-organized Book view. A lot of photographers merely read photos on their DSLRs, tablets, phones and webcams these days. The laborious task of manual color correction, cropping, and preference setting has been taken out of their hands and turned into a simpler process with the advent of the most popular image editor software, Photoshop.
