When you first run Adobe Photoshop, it will look for a synchronization service to talk to, which is used to sync Photoshop with Adobe Creative Cloud (previously Lightroom) and Creative Cloud storage, such as Creative Cloud Assets, and Adobe Stock. For some, that will require setting up a service, but you can avoid that if you have Adobe CC. After you run Photoshop, it will tell you it's creating a service connection for syncing with other products, which is normal behavior. But unless you'd like to update that connection manually whenever you use Photoshop, and you don't want every time you run the program to have to let it try to connect to adobe.com every time, don't let Photoshop create a connection. Make sure you click "Skip" on the first screen that will try to get you to join a CC service. That approval lets you choose a syncing connection, and you can also choose a syncing profile: one or more living, edited images, background image, or a combination. Many of the available connections are geared more for individual users. The most common connection, probably, is Lightroom CC. Individual profiles can take hours to connect to the service, so be patient. You can create a handful of different profiles in a normal session. During a session, it will usually connect to a profile, sync, and disconnect, so you need to keep an eye on that, else you could inadvertently connect to a profile that's not correct for something you're doing. Support for Photoshop doesn't seem based on Windows 10 or Windows 8.1, so if you're in the latter, you're out of luck. However, in Photoshop Creative Cloud, trying to open a recent, stored PSD file from Windows 10 or 8.1 may require that you have the (superfluous) "Windows 10 Creators Update" or "Windows 8.1 Update" instead of "Windows 10 Fall Creators Update" installed, according to Adobe's support website (though there appears to be no way to query that fact).

Canva: What It Does: The first thing you'll notice upon visiting this site is the background. The background image is a photographic image of a rolling grassland. The image comes from one of my latest projects. I wanted to be able to see a before and after image of my work immediately, so therefore I used a photograph of the image rather than send it to a photographer. I also wanted to keep the file size of the web image small so I used File:Save for Web to make it a JPEG with approximately the dimensions of a 320 × 220 pixel image. Lastly, I have not altered the color of this photograph and I intend for the final website to have the same color palette as the image that appears on the website itself. In other words, I want it to match. e3d0a04c9c
