In Photoshop Elements, the base version of Photoshop, layered masks are used to create complex, adjustable layers that selectively "mask off" areas of an image and reveal any underlying areas. These are especially useful for everything from bump-ups to healing portraits, to creating and retouching T-Shirts. In Photoshop, layered masks are more of a starting point than the end-result. Although we created seamless masks of the "boxing scenes" in this lesson, the results are limited by the vectors' sharp pixel edges if you're looking to create high-fidelity pieces. If so, you'll have to "break down" the vector masks into raster masks and rasterize the objects (see "Generating and Remaking Vector in Photoshop" for more on rasterizing). Layered masks can be used for direct painting as well, just apply the pixel colors (B,G,R) to the "mask" layer on the layer below and voila, you have an existing selection, just as always. e3d0a04c9c
